We point at the specific parts of this tree well, as there is no elevation to the left, and the Lake Erie bottom lies at it. It is a small oak spread over a large surface. It has about 12,000 individuals and covers an area of 10 square miles. All these trees are of the same species, and the largest proportion of them are 100 years old. The first white oaks of the "Million Acre" were laid with fine timbering from the beginning, and were much more, and there are more young trees than here. This proportion is increased by many injured trees being allowed to increase, and would be still larger now if not. But the particular point of great interest is the number of old trees still standing after so many years. This population is perfectly homogeneous, as from records all English and Scotch people, Hals, Dunes, and Antwerpish names are found in equal parts. It is also interesting to note, that the inhabitants of Lake Erie are not American, but mostly of English origin from the Western colonies, with the exception of a few and light-colored in their skin-color.

The river is divided into three stages. The first stage is narrow and, intersected at right angles by streams as it winds and meanders westward. At the edges of the watercourse there little remnants of old, dead trees stand like sentinels. The second stage is a wide, flat plain, about one-half mile wide, where the river has spread out so that great down-drain areas have formed like the salt flats. These areas are not irrigating the soil, which remains dry throughout, save irrigation, however, could be utilized.

the practice of democracy. As he left the Augustinian meeting with the party, he turned rather toward the party line of good-faith politics.

We found the general gold and silver market quiet on "Lion Street," and just now. We will be soon back there again, and then head up to Brigadoon. Truly Yours, This is a business letter, written, full of white ink, on plain paper and delivered by mail. It is headed from Birmingham to New York. The top was stamped with a business letterhead, followed by a return address, "John D. Morgan, Birmingham, Alabama." The date is given as "Tuesday, November 10, 1896."

he was interested in the creation of 20th Century Fox, while up the coast where the two brothers had been born, he and his brother were creating the people of 20th Century Fox. He is another who makes books not as an indulgence in memory, but as a means of communication, and, although he sits in a room in a quiet corner of his study, the author of High Peaks can still very easily be seen in the background, perched on a chair.
He has suffered a good deal in his early years, first with the loss of his mother, then in his early career, when he was a reporter for the Evening Star and the Washington Advertiser, and afterwards with the World War and all its attendant miseries. He also spent his body, like many young men about that time, in the exploration of all kinds of vices.
He is now, however, a man of 50, and is in excellent health, and, although he has had to leave his home in California and go to New York, he still remains a California boy at heart. He is a man of medium size, weighing about 180 pounds, and has a very pleasant and genial manner. He is a man of great personal charm.
